

Nursing Home in Kelowna

Nursing Home in Kelowna - Facilities that offer full-time care to people with medical needs are called nursing homes. Individuals in nursing homes have medical conditions which are stable enough that they do not require hospital care. These facilities are typically used by patients who have medical conditions which require constant supervision or the care of a nurse or other healthcare professional.

Nursing homes are often confused with other similar facilities like retirement homes or assisted living facilities. Assisted living facilities and retirement homes are different from nursing homes in that they do not provide nursing care. These other facilities offer a wide array of assistance to people who want or need some kind of assistance with their every day life, like for instance preparing meals and transportation, but do not have medical conditions that require constant nursing care.

Nurses' aides, nurses, physiotherapists, occupational therapists, cooks, social workers, and housekeeping are the employees working at a nursing homes. The employees work as a group to offer general supervision, medical care, injury rehabilitation help and adaptation of activities of every day living, hygienic care and assistance, and help with psychological or personal problems.

The types of equipment found in hospitals are often the same kinds of equipment found in nursing homes. In several facilities, patients can receive dialysis treatments as well as treatment for respiratory, pulmonary, and cardiovascular conditions and even cancer. A lot of these treatments were once only available in hospitals, as no other facilities were considered to be sterile and safe enough.

Usually, nursing homes are considered as just long term inpatient care facilities. However, a lot also offer outpatient programs as well as short term care. When a member of a family has a medical condition, especially if it occurs suddenly, the burden on other family members can often be too much, or the medical needs too high. Nursing homes provide short term respite care programs for families who cannot offer full-time care due to other responsibilities. Adult daycare is also available in a lot of facilities. Adult daycare could often give a person a higher quality of life by offering recreation, stimulation, and the chance to be social. Adult daycare and short term respite can relieve the burden of stress on both the patient's caregivers or family members and the patient herself.

Most nursing home facilities are intended for older individuals who, over time, have become less able to care properly for themselves. Nonetheless, nursing homes are not just limited to seniors, they usually house younger individuals as well. Patients in a nursing home are normally those who are mentally ill, disabled, terminally ill or elderly. Alzheimer's disease or dementia are common conditions that impact numerous individuals as they grow older, meaning that they might need medical care and full time supervision and assistance with daily tasks like personal hygiene. Moreover, falls and other injuries can sometimes impact the ability of an individual to care for themselves, either in the long term or short term. These kinds of injuries could need full time care which caregivers or families might not be able to offer.

Nursing homes could provide the high level of supervision and possible medical care needed by a lot of patients with mental illnesses. Nursing homes may also be suitable facilities for end of life care, when any other kind of medical intervention is deemed to be ineffective. The nursing home may then be able to make the patient as comfortable as possible. Nursing home facilities are very useful in situations where an individual suffers a sickness or a serious accident. The nursing home personnel will be able to provide 24 hour care and work together to rehabilitate the patient until they are able to be self-sufficient again.

In a place which is safe, relaxed and inviting, a good nursing home facility would strive to provide all the necessary medical care. When choosing which facility is the most suitable, the situation and requirements of the person should be assessed in order to be sure that they are placed into the right facility.
